Ingersoll's Figures Used to Describe the Size of the Crowds.

Cleveland in Chicago.

Chicago, October 5.—The city was early astir this morning. Many people had been up all night, and were on the streets at an early hour. The weather was cool and bracing, and the sun rose in a cloudless sky. The presidential party arrived at the depot at 7:30 o'clock. The reception committee was on hand to receive them. There was a loud shout from the crowd when the president appeared on the platform of the car, and three cheers as the distinguished pair walked arm in arm to the platform of their carriage. A moment later the carriage door closed with a slam, the four spirited horses jumped as a whip cracked over their heads and the president was riding through the streets of Chicago.

It was only a few moments after 8 o'clock this morning when the people commenced to stop at the depot where the president was advertised to alight from his special train. But it was not before fitting of the great republican that the president arrived. When he reached the first long at Chicago. The enthusiasm was electrical. Such cheering and such hearty faces in the same town have never been seen before. There have been demonstrations, warm and cordial as can gather within a few blocks of the depot. Above the heads of the crowd [illegible] the heavy [illegible] of [illegible] and all four companies of cavalry and artillery. Their arrival created a sensation which even a mob could not equal. As the president's carriage appeared in the street the crowd was nearly good natured. Its one wish was to be near enough for the president and his lady. Around the [illegible] there was an enormous crowd, and the police were [illegible] force enough to hold the crowd back from the coach which the president entered. As the president's carriage passed the military formed around it and the crowd with wild cheering fell in behind. The president took off his hat the moment he got into the carriage, and Mrs. Cleveland smiled as a young cheer went up. He seemed well pleased with the reception, and [illegible] was [illegible] Mrs. Cleveland [illegible] Both were [illegible] Mrs. Cleveland [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

The Denver Democrat says that the railroads will make a desperate effort to control the next congress so as to secure the repeal of the inter-state commerce law. We very much doubt this. The law has done away with a good many abuses, and the railroad companies are on the whole pleased with it. The real weakness of the bill is its want of definiteness in the long and short haul section. The commission has partly, but not entirely, remedied this defect, and will, we have no doubt, in a short time, by well considered rulings, all but remove it. The New York [illegible] is very objectionable on the railroads' account to us, however, that the people are more interested in its repeal than the railroads. The long and short haul section particularly is directly against the interests of every commercial center. There it only enables their rivals to overcome a disadvantage which the hill gives. But the people along the less favored points wherever the application of the long and short haul principle can be [illegible] It deprives the local merchant of so much business and necessitates increased charges on local business. The people themselves can do nothing but pay the increased rates and Bank commissions for it.
